

Learning to have a good manner s is essential for children especially in a small age. However, when it comes to responsibility between parents and schools, some think that it is parents' '\'' accountability compulsory while others s think schools are much better to instruct the norm. From my prospective, those points have benefits and my arguments are listed as follows.

Effrom the outset, people think that parents spend most of the time accompanying their children, so they should teach them some polite standards in everyday life such as table manners and social manners. As a matter of fact, children like to imitate their parents; therefore, it is necessary that families build the standard to develop good habits for children.

On the other hand, schools are also a place for children to socialize. In school, they can learn how to build relationships with others. I in addition, teachers are good instructors to tell right and wrong. For instance, my cousin, Alex, likes s d to do some tricks to on girls. He thinks s it is a good way to grab the attention from others and receive acceptance from boys. Once upon a time, he pretended to do nothing after snatching a girl's s '\''s hair as usual. He did it for fun; nevertheless, the girl started to cry loudly because she could not stand it anymore. Although my cousin kept apologizing, everyone thought it as an act of violence. By classmates' '\'' gossip and teacher's s '\''s criticism, he realized that it was an is impolite unpolite behavior to do on others.

In my opinion, families and schools all are all good environments for children to learn patterns. Schools can give good circumstances to interact with others and in in the meantime, families can serve as a model for being friendly to others. Therefore, not only do schools have the responsibility, but families also held accountable have the mandatory to tell children how to be a good person. They are all good members to support young children to become a mature adults.
